History of Braces

Braces may look modern practice, but evidence of such procedures goes all down the lane to ancient Egypt. The world of orthodontia has proceeded to see maturity year after year, with less invasive systems and hardware being added even nowadays.

Ancient Egyptian mummies have been discovered with metal coiled around their teeth. Additionally, there have been reports found which explain how to straighten misaligned teeth and file twisted teeth, all this evidence is proof of braces aren't new.

Types of Braces

As orthodontic technology improves, the types of braces available to the general public evolve. No longer do we see the mortifying headgear of years past. Braces have developed and can be extremely discreet.

Traditional Braces

Traditional braces are a very widespread alternative for most. They're the most economical, and the treatment is tried and tested for ages. These traditional metal brackets allow for some color customization and are more inadequate than the ones some grownups may remember from their childhood. Ceramic Braces

Ceramic braces are a lot like traditional braces, except the brackets are clear or tooth-colored, so as to be more discreet. They are more expensive than traditional braces, but the unobtrusive appearance allows patients to feel more confident about their smiles while undergoing orthodontic treatment.

Clear Aligners

A new alternative has risen up for braces over the past some years: clear aligners. Treatments such as Invisalign have renovated braces by implementing orthodontic treatment that is transparent to others, what else an adult can desire. Customized trays are given to patients to use and barter out with dentists in every 14 days. Get this treatment at orthodontist near me.

These applications are on the expensive side for those exploring orthodontic work. However, many adults find this alternative to be the most attractive because of the transparent feature.
